

WALROCK HOMEBREW

TRADERS AND MERCHANTS

FIFTH EDITION

STRONGHOLDS: TRADERS & MERCHANTS

STRONGHOLD BUILDING EXPANSION

With a filled keg over each arm, a male dwarf trudges away from the snowy peaks of his homeland, a similarly-laden mule following in his footsteps. Though the dwarf knows the closest town is weeks away, he has full confidence in the quality of his wares. Smelling profits on the wind, he ventures ever forward, seeking riches and glory for his clan.

In the midst of a bustling market, a mousy female halfling with round, thick glasses scribbles away within a tome. Beside her lies a pile of her completed works, finely bound, proclaiming their titles in bold lettering. Concerned only with her writing, the halfling pays no heed to attracting customers, trusting that her books and reputation will be more than enough to entice passersby.

Set against the edge of an alleyway, a male kobold clad only in a burlap sack waves his arms and chitters frantically, attempting to attract buyers. The kobold eventually gives up, sighing, glancing over towards his nearby pile of identical burlap sacks, complete with arm and head holes. No buyers today - but tomorrow, who knows?

Though few of their ilk consider it, adventurers are far from being the only individuals enterprising and foolhardy enough to journey the wider world in search of fortune and glory. Merchants travel far and wide, often finding themselves at bustling hubs of business, such as port towns, trade hubs, and the more mercantile strongholds that pepper the disparate reaches of the world. Each merchant has their own motivations for and methods of pursuing free enterprise, and for every merchant just trying to get by, there's at least one more with fervent dreams of someday, somehow, making it big and retiring to comfort and fortune.

Included here are sample merchant inventories for the merchants that visit and take up residence at player-owned strongholds. This expansion is designed to work with the core Fortress, Temples, & Strongholds option available at Walrock Homebrew, though these merchants can function equally well when found throughout the wider world.

MERCHANT CHARACTERISTICS

Much like adventurers themselves, merchants often have hopes, dreams, and fatal flaws of their own. If you wish to characterize a merchant for roleplaying purposes, roll on or choose from the following tables.

d8 Personality Trait

- 1 I greet absolutely everyone with a warm hug.
- 2 I have a much better head for numbers than people.
- 3 I'm often more willing to barter in favors than coin.
- 4 I don't trust adventurers, not even a little bit.
- 5 It's all business with me, no need to be personable.
- 6 Repeat customers are my best friends.
- 7 I'll haggle all day, until your ears fall off.
- 8 I'm convinced my natural showmanship is what earns me customers.

d6 Ideal

- 1 Commerce. Free exchange is the world's greatest equalizer. (Lawful)
- 2 Monopoly. Undercutting my rivals and price gouging are the only ways to get ahead. (Evil)
- 3 Salesmanship. I'll sell absolutely anything. My horse, my mother, everything has a price. (Chaotic)
- 4 Charity. I try to give discounts or handouts to those that are truly in need. (Good)
- 5 Finality. No refunds. Ever. (Any)
- 6 Enjoyment. Buying and selling wares is all a big game to me, one that I love playing. (Any)

d6 Bond

- 1 I have a sick relative that my business supports.
- 2 I owe a lot of money to organized crime, and they're threatening to collect. Violently.
- 3 I'm counting down the days to a peaceful retirement with my spouse or loved ones.
- 4 I hope to earn enough money to be able to pursue my true love, who is well above my station.
- 5 I'm on the run from the law, and plan to leave town before they finally recognize me.
- 6 A large portion of my money is spent atoning for my shameful past.

d6 Flaw

- 1 Most of my money is spent every night in the tavern.
- 2 I have no real faith in the quality of my merchandise, whether or not it is actually good.
- 3 If someone undercuts my prices, I'll cut their throat.
- 4 I counterfeit currency on the side, and slip it in with the change I give customers.
- 5 I never, ever, ever know when to quit, and I refuse to lose a sale.
- 6 It's hard for me to respect someone who doesn't know everything about what I'm selling.

MERCHANT INVENTORIES

Merchants come from distant lands bearing exotic wares, and have wildly different specialties. Even within a specialty, merchants are of dramatically different quality depending on the materials they can acquire, and their skill at the art of commerce.

When you require a merchant, you may create one by rolling on the tables in the Merchants and Traders section of FORTRESSES, TEMPLES, AND STRONGHOLDS, or by rolling on the expanded table presented here:

d100 Merchants

1-6	Alcohol and refreshment
7-10	Animals (mounts and pets)
11-15	Books and maps (mundane)
16-19	Flowers and seeds
20-25	Food and animal parts
26-29	Furniture and interior decor
30-34	High fashion
35-38	Jewelry and gems
39-43	Knick-knacks
44-48	Leatherworking
49-52	Mechanical contraptions
53-57	Medium and heavy armor (and shields)
58-61	Potions, poisons, and herbs
62-66	Religious idols and blessings
67-71	Songs and instruments
72-75	Spell tomes and scrolls
76-80	Thieving supplies
81-86	Tools
87-91	Vehicles and transportation
92-96	Weapons
97-100	Legendary merchant (roll once on the Legendary Merchants table)

SUBJECT TO AVAILABILITY

Many different types of merchants are listed here, and not all merchants are appropriate to every setting. A magic items merchant might be illogical for a setting where magic items are too rare to be sold, or a mechanical contraptions merchant may be at odds with a setting that has yet to discover clockwork.

If a thematically inappropriate merchant is rolled (or chosen) on these tables, simply reroll (or choose again) until a more appropriate merchant is selected. In the case of legendary merchants, roll again on the legendary merchants table, unless none of the available legendary merchants would be thematically acceptable.

Magic items exist in the inventories of many merchants, especially legendary or excellent merchants. If magic items are not sold in your world, ignore the presence of these items.

If a Legendary Merchant is rolled on the Merchants table, roll once on the following table to determine which Legendary Merchant your players encounter:

d20 Legendary Merchants

1-2	Astral traveler
3-6	Enchantments
7	Fey bargains
8-11	Magic items
12-14	Magical creatures
15-18	Necromancy
19	Needful things
20	Time-lost

Whenever you roll or choose a merchant, roll on the Quality table, below, to determine the quality of their goods. Legendary merchants do not exist below medium quality, and their quality should be rerolled until it is medium or higher.

d20 Quality

1-2	Atrocious	1d10 x 20 gp
3-6	Poor	1d10 x 50 gp
7-12	Medium	1d10 x 100 gp
13-17	Good	1d10 x 250 gp
18-20	Excellent	1d10 x 500 gp

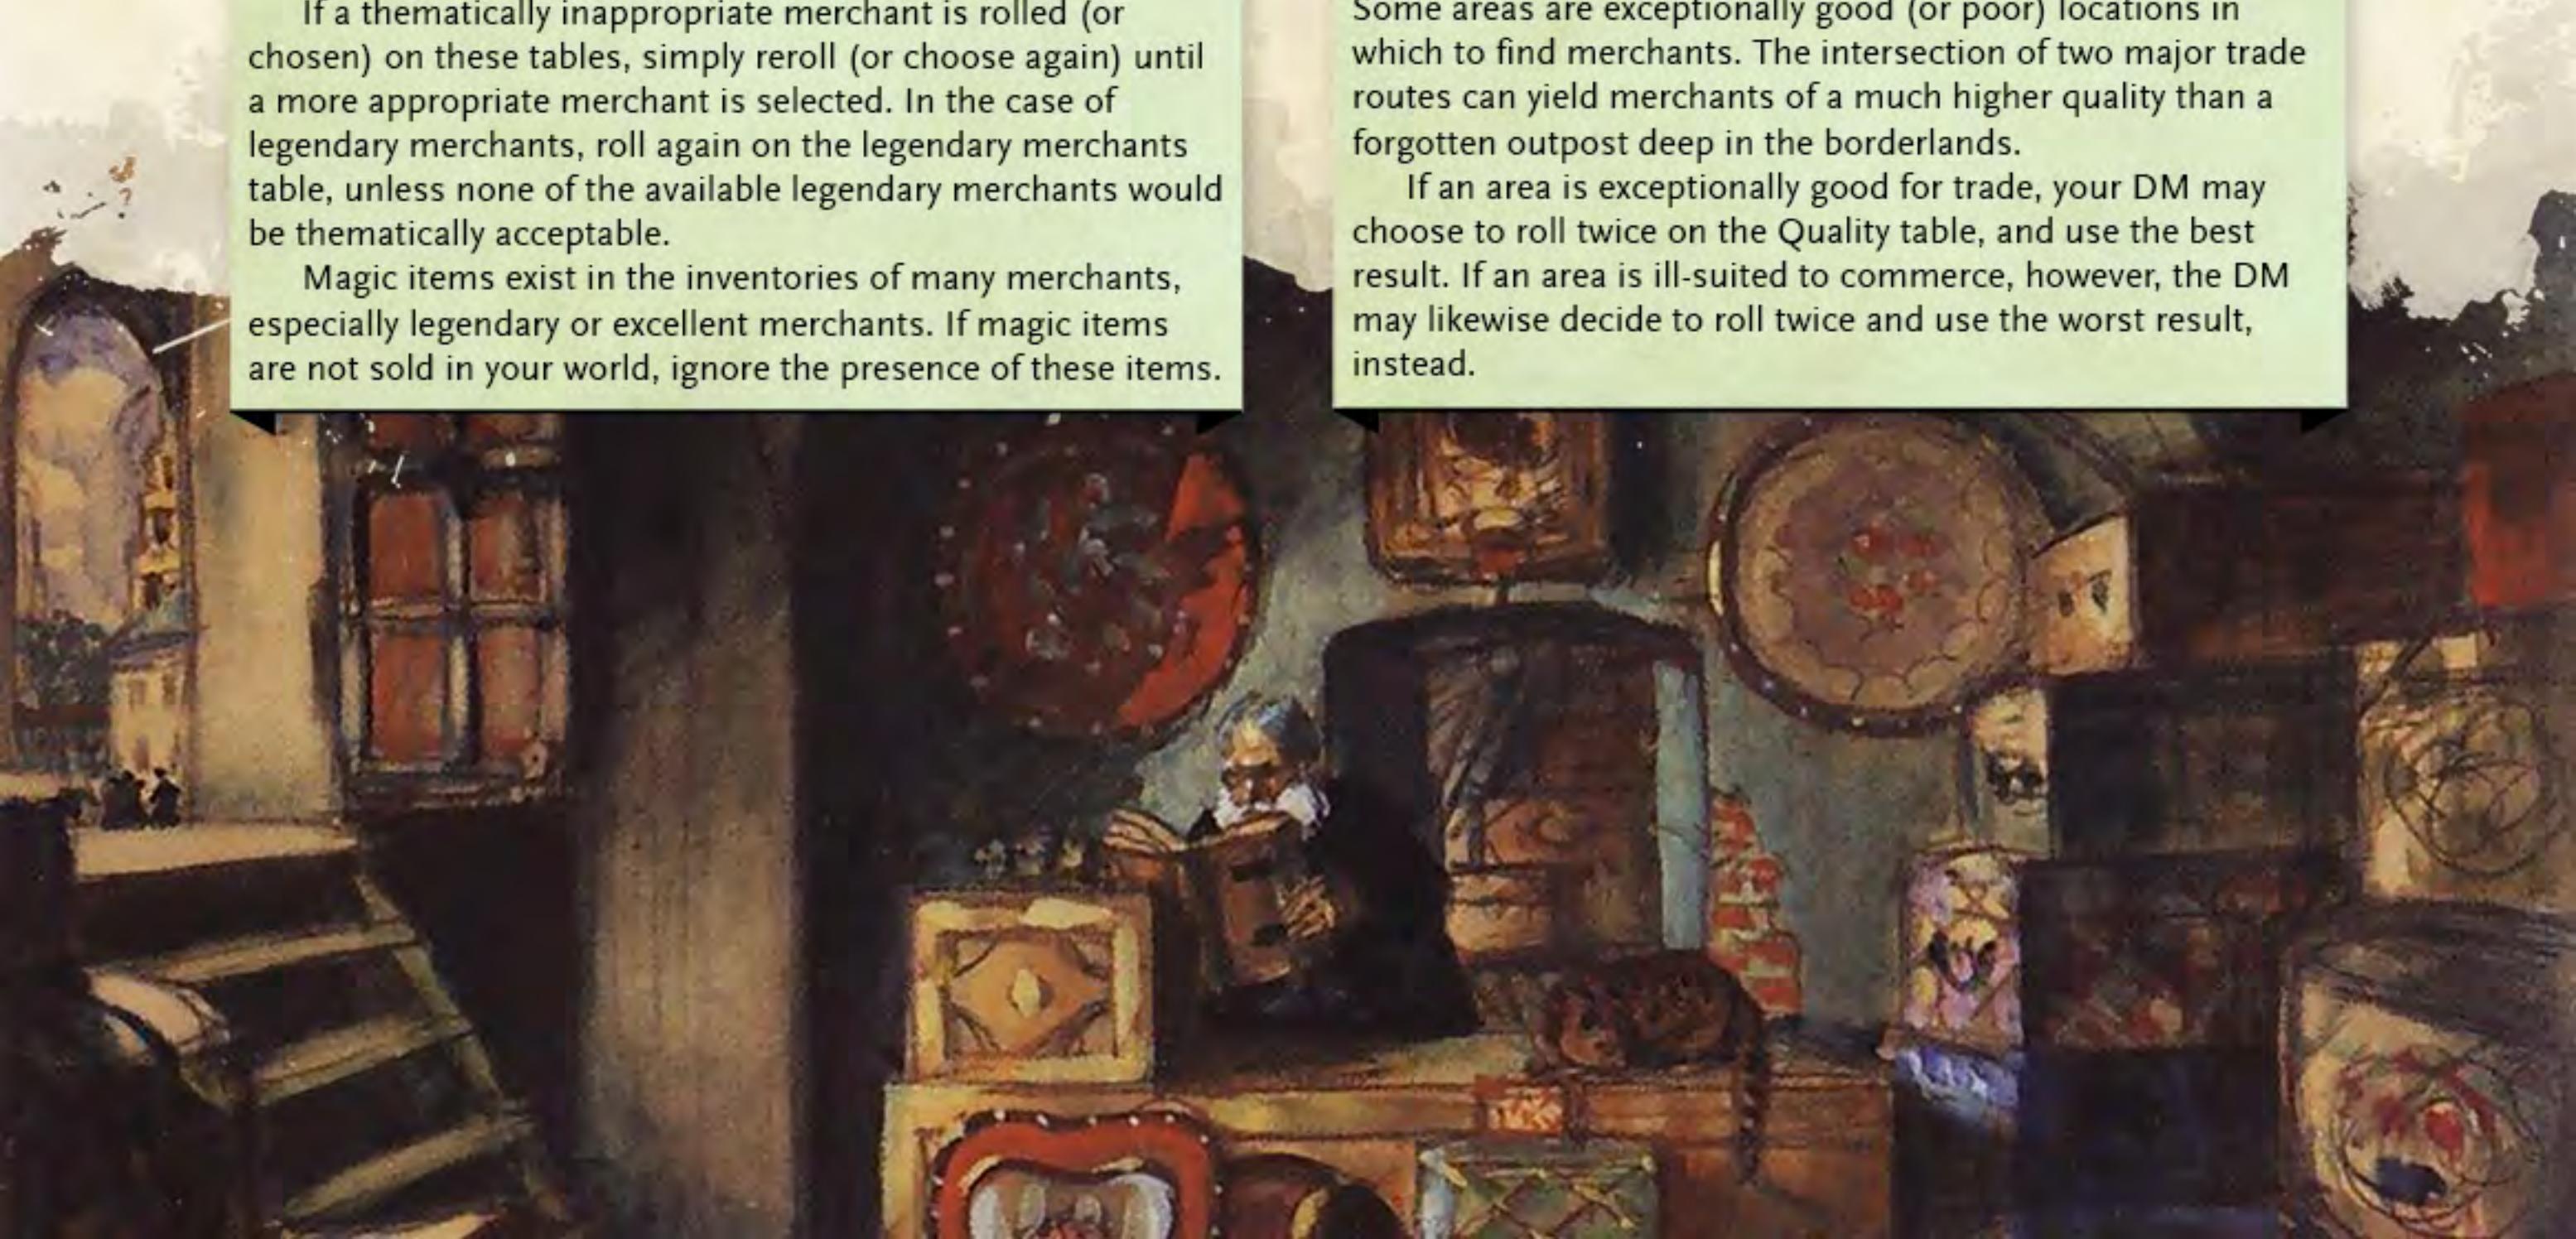

Merchants carry goods on their respective list that belong to their quality or lesser. This means that a medium Jewelry merchant would be able to dispense items available to a poor or atrocious Jewelry merchant, but a good High Fashion merchant would be unable to dispense excellent quality items on their inventory list.

Merchants may be willing to buy items the players are selling, usually those that are of and good make and similar enough to the items they already carry. Merchants often are willing to pay half the ordinary price for wares the players are selling, excepting magic items, which obey their own special rules (found on pages 129-130 of the Dungeon Master's Guide). Currency carried by merchants for such purposes is typically kept in a secure location, such as a trapped lockbox.

THE INVISIBLE HAND AT WORK

Some areas are exceptionally good (or poor) locations in which to find merchants. The intersection of two major trade routes can yield merchants of a much higher quality than a forgotten outpost deep in the borderlands.

If an area is exceptionally good for trade, your DM may choose to roll twice on the Quality table, and use the best result. If an area is ill-suited to commerce, however, the DM may likewise decide to roll twice and use the worst result, instead.

ALCOHOL AND REFRESHMENT

A dusky tavern reverberates with raucous laughter and the clink of mugs raised in a toast. A stoic female dragon-born tavernkeep looks on, polishing an obligatory mug, her eyes searching for signs of trouble.

Nearby ale barrels stacked higher than herself, a female dwarf tends to a roadside stall, cleaning her countertop with a grungy dishrag. Colorful flags flap aimlessly in the breeze as she awaits weary, thirsty travelers.

A staple of civilization, some theorize that alcohol is what motivated early societies to pursue large-scale agriculture. Merchants that deal in alcohol and other beverages continue this proud tradition, crafting personalized brews for discerning palates.

Most merchants with this specialization carry all items listed for their given quality and below, though some beverages may be omitted due to geography, availability, or the merchant's own predilections. As examples, coffee or rum may not exist without a tropical region to foster their creation, or a trade route to the same. Similarly, a dwarven brewer may not be willing to carry fancy, fine wines, while a high elf wine aficionado may turn up their nose at the thought of selling ale. Some merchants of this specialization even eschew selling alcohol entirely, focusing on the other forms of refreshment listed here. In most cases, merchants with this specialization of medium quality and above refuse to sell inferior ale, considering the substance to be below their standards.

ANIMALS

Sweeping up straw and other leavings, a male forest gnome tends to the cleanliness of a musty stable. Though a casual onlooker would never guess, the gnome holds a calm confidence that his horses are of the highest calibur.

Cages and crates punctured with small holes line a wood elf's stand on a busy market street. An imposing hawk on his arm, passers-by can barely hear the soft cheeping of hawk chicks over the roar of the marketplace.

Animal merchants specialize in selling mounts and companions from near and far. Usually, no more than three types of animals from each applicable quality are present at any one merchant's place of business, and no merchants aside from those of atrocious quality are willing to sell a dead animal.

Sold animals are usually tame, but may not be, if marked otherwise. Untamed animals may require Animal Handling checks to interact with them favorably, usually with a DC of 10 or 15 depending on the task demanded of them. These animals may become tamed over time, at your DM's discretion.

BOOKS AND MAPS

Shelves upon shelves of tomes line the walls of an old wooden scriptorium, and in the center of it all sits an improbably calm half-orc. As the aged scriptorium door creaks open, the half-orc adjusts his spectacles, staring into the bright daylight at those entering his shop.

With maps rolled and scrolled bristling from her backpack, a half-elf smiles cheerfully as she waves down travelers. One of the best cartographers in the land, she strides forward full of confidence, knowing that no matter where they are headed, anyone passing this busy crossroad could use one of her maps.

Not all books are magical, and indeed most are not. Books are always valuable, however, signifying a substantial amount of effort on the part of authors and transcribers across multiple ages. The same holds true for maps, and both are effective tools to ensure that the vital knowledge and stories of the past are never forgotten.

MERCHANTS WITH THIS SPECIALIZATION usually have every item of their quality or lesser in stock, though some do distribute maps or books exclusively. Often, these merchants are authors, cartographers, scribes or transcribers themselves, and turn to selling their wares personally as a method of building reputation and fame within their craft.

The prices listed here assume the merchant exists in a world where wide-spread use of such technologies as the printing press and movable type do not exist. Should the merchant and others have access to a printing press, your DM may decide to reduce the prices of applicable items (such as books or maps) by half, signifying the relative ease of use of these technologies, and their impact on production and distribution. Your DM may also decide that newspapers cannot exist in settings without a printing press or equivalent technology, and thus cannot be for sale.

Guidebook. These lightweight books contain information on a specific geographic area, such as a city or a forest, or on a specific type of monster found nearby, such as beasts, fey, or aberrants. Whatever the book's subject, those that read it gain advantage on knowledge checks about the subject or creature type to which it pertains. For example, a guidebook for a local desert could confer advantage on a Survival check to find food in that region, or a Nature check to tell if a type of cactus is poisonous. Likewise, a guidebook detailing the anatomy and culture of dragons might grant advantage on Arcana or History checks concerning them, or even Persuasion checks dealing sufficiently with the dragon's culture. These books are always tied to an area or a creature type within an area, and become less useful the further one travels from its intended region.

FLOWERS AND SEEDS

Footsteps clattering against cobbled stone, a female human wearing an airy pink dress walks slowly through the dingy city streets, attempting to be seen. In the crook of her arm lies a basket of fresh-picked wildflowers, a small taste of country living that she sells for but a few pieces of copper.

A male dragonborn, dark in scale and countenance, levels his draconic glare at those avoiding his flower shop. Surrounded by bushels of colorful flowers arranged in hanging woven baskets, the dragonborn scowls, wondering why sales have been so surprisingly abysmal.

Flowers represent light, life, and love in a variety of cultures, and merchants across many lands sell beautiful floral arrangements symbolizing anything from a new, springtime romance to a loss most somber and tragic. Many of these merchants dabble (or fully specialize) in other botanicals, such as trees or crops, and carry with them precious seeds used to grow all manner of plants. Merchants with this specialty typically carry everything available to their quality and below.

Dragon Lilly. These beautiful lillies grow in the slow moving water found in shallow ponds and streams, and consume the impurities found in their natural environment. Though they naturally go through this process gradually, once picked a dragon lilly goes into a shock of sorts, seeking additional nutrition to heal. Placed in up to 10 gallons of water, a picked dragon lilly will instantly consume any impurities within once before fully dying, rendering the water safe to drink.

Phoenixbloom. Burning softly and emitting a gentle fragrance like incense, phoenixbloom flowers burn eternally, giving off bright light in a radius of 20 feet, and dim light for 20 feet after that. Any creature that comes into contact with the flaming blossoms, either through an attack or by failing a Dexterity saving throw when walking through a grove of phoenixbloom, takes 1d4 fire damage.

FOOD AND ANIMAL PARTS

Sharpening a large and rather imposing cleaver, a human adorned with a white, puffy hat turns toward a hunk of beastflesh resting on a wooden board. With a series of repetitive strikes, he brings the cleaver down, slicing the meat with an exquisite thinness, beginning to prepare a meal.

Warming herself near a roadside campfire, a halfling clad in leathers carefully lowers a pot onto the flame. As it rises to a rolling boil, she adds a handful of foraged spices before tossing in a chunk of venison, caught by one of her traps. As the meat stews, she keeps a wary eye for travelers, especially those willing to exchange coin for food.

Merchants of this specialty often either make their food themselves, or sell food prepared by another chef in their employ. Highly likely to further specialize in making specific types or cultures of food, these merchants, when good quality or higher, tend to perceive their craft as an art form. As such, if the merchant is of a high enough quality, they are unwilling to sell meals inferior to the best that they can make, and typically refuse to sell all but the rarest animal byproducts.

FURNITURE AND INTERIOR DECOR

A high elf sits in front of a canvas, pondering, paint brush resting on her lower lip. Inspiration strikes and she raises the brush, applying paint to canvas, sculpting a pastoral scene in the feywild to add to the staggering collection of art adorning the walls of her shop.

In a black, tight-fitted tunic and wearing eccentric angular glasses, a mustachioed gnome observes the space before him. It takes him but a moment to conclude as to what this area needs to make it whole and vibrant. Now, he thinks, to sell its owners on the idea of an indoor fountain.

Artists, designers, and art-sellers, these merchants are often artisans of their given trade. Each work that passes through their hands is personal, in a way, and these merchants would be more than happy to inform buyers of the history and work that goes into what they're buying.

Merchants in this speciality either offer all of what's available to their quality, or sell one particular type of item. Some items (such as fountains, custom-made banners, and tapestries) must be made rather than sold outright, and are often constructed (for pay) from materials on-site by either the merchant or an artist in their employ. The items are made to order, and are labelled as such, though a merchant may have older, uncustomized versions of these items in their shops either for sale or for demonstration purposes. Any item that is made to order takes a number of days to complete equal to its gold cost divided by 10, at which point it is either ready to be picked up or is delivered to a place agreed upon at the time of the item's sale.

HIGH FASHION

Engrossed in her work, a stern halfling wearing half-moon spectacles carefully sews two pieces of a dress form together, her eyes squinting in the low light of her dress shop. Around her are mannequins clothed in all manner of finery, domestic and exotic, showing visitors the range and scope of the halfling's talents.

Pulling a soft rabbit-hide off the drying rack, a male wood elf selects a shining pair of silver shears and begins to cut the pelt down to size. As he works with scissor, fur, needle and thread, his deft fingers gradually form a warm winter hat, suitable for the most refined of lords seeking to hunt or journey in the snow.

Creating and selling clothes fit for all levels of society, merchants with this specialty usually sell most of the items available to their quality. Merchants in this specialization often consider themselves artisans (regardless of their actual skill level), however, and may decline selling articles that they think are below them, or that do not go along with their cultural perspective. A haughty tiefling socialite, for example, would consider the selling of commoner's clothes to deprecate her esteemed reputation, while a down-to-earth dwarven hatmaker might see aristocratic finery as frivolous and functionless.

JEWELRY AND GEMS

A shining glass jeweler's loupe set against his eye, a male rock gnome wearing shoddy overalls inspects the quality of a gemstone held in one of his leather-gloved hands. Though large, the gem is nevertheless found to be of inferior quality. Sighing and setting it aside, the gnome continues to inventory his gemstones, which cover every available surface in his shop.

Her pock-marked stone tabletop cluttered with grindstones, small hammers, and even a tiny anvil, a female dwarf covered in dust and grime casts a small melting pot of steel into a circular mold, setting it shut. As the ring she is molding begins to cool, she hums an old drinking song, ignoring the cluster of children around her stall, watching her work, as she looks for properly interested adults to buy her wares.

Merchants with this specialty craft and sell ornamental pieces of metalwork, as well as the gems such jewelry often includes. These merchants most often sell all items available to their quality or below, but may occasionally further specialize into selling either only gems and raw materials, or only crafted jewelry.

These merchants may also custom-make jewelry for your character, built to your specifications. Such jewelry takes a number of days equal to its cost in gp divided by 10 to be fully crafted, whereupon the merchant will either have it ready for your character to pick up, or, if they are good quality or above, be willing to deliver it to a location of your character's choosing.

KNICK-KNACKS

Toting an overstuffed backpack, a goblin walks down a major trade route, waving down travellers, adventurers, and other merchants. Like others of her kin, the goblin scrounges for whatever she needs to survive. Unlike the others, however, she often finds it preferable to use passers-by to turn a tidy profit through honest trade, rather than using them as a target for banditry.

Sitting on a stool amidst the heaps of junk cluttering his shop, a half-orc clad in slacks and a vest waits patiently. He never knows just exactly what he'll sell to those who walk through his door, but he greats any opportunity to part with a piece of the detritus with an almost disarming enthusiasm.

Merchants dealing in knick-knacks sell odd collections of goods not available elsewhere. A knick-knack merchant can truly have anything, and often have all items available to their quality or lesser in addition to several items not listed here.

LEATHERWORKING

Pulling a smooth, wood-tipped arrow from the hide of a fallen elk, a wood elf slicks back her hair in the same practiced motion as she unsheathes a curved obsidian knife. Taking great care to properly skin the beast, she then hauls the large, steaming hide back to her village. Travelers always appreciate the craftsmanship of her goods, and the gold this hide will provide, once cured and crafted, should feed her family all through the winter.

His hands threading a needle with expert precision, a tiefling begins to sew ornamental strips of cut leather onto an unfinished saddle. His shop smelling of deep, comfortable musk from the assembled rows of finished leather goods, the tiefling has no doubt that his current work should be done before the end of the week.

Leatherworkers sell leather armor, bags, saddles, and other goods to those that require them. Merchants with this specialization usually are able to sell everything available to their quality or lower, and rarely further specialize into selling only a specific type of item.

MECHANICAL CONTRAPCTIONS

Up to her elbows in cogs and covered in grease, a rock gnome tirelessly fiddles with the intricate metal creation in front of her. Pulling out a key from one of her apron's many pockets, she winds the contraption up, before setting it upright on the table. The hand-sized mechanical dragon at once whirs, roars, and belches a gout of flame that sets the gnome's wooden tabletop alight. The gnome cheers gleefully, and applauds her latest work.

Trudging along a dusty forest trail, a kobold weighed down by several heavy hunting traps on his belt drags an equally-heavy satchel over his back. Every step causes clanks and clatters, but the kobold pays them no mind. He finds a simple satisfaction in selling his work, as, in his opinion, the world could always use more traps.

Merchants that sell mechanical contraptions are tinkers, dabbling in the bleeding edge of clockwork technology. These merchants are more than happy to sell anything available to their quality or lower, and will give (overly) detailed instructions on the proper use of their wares.

Clockwork contraptions sold by this merchant must be wound with an object interaction to be used. All such clockwork items (excepting the mount and sled) are small enough to hold in one or two hands. Wound clockwork items run for a minute, or four hours in the case of the mount.

MEDIUM AND HEAVY ARMOR

Holding a hammer as large and heavy as his fist, a dwarf pounds sheets of metal into protective shapes against a pitch-black anvil. His shop only lit by the dim light of molten slag from his forge, he nevertheless looks over his work with a keen eye, studying it closely for any weaknesses or imperfections.

Riding an enormous warhorse laden with heavy saddlebags, an armored half-orc rides the trade routes with an eye out for customers. All must learn of her mastery of armocraft, she thinks, and she will travel the world until her name is held in great reknown.

Merchants that deal in armor are typically blacksmiths themselves, forging their wares and selling them off to those that need them. Most of these merchants sell everything on this list available to their quality or below, though atrocious items are very rarely sold as actual armor by anyone outside merchants of that quality.

These merchants may have a specific predilection that prohibits them from selling certain items, however. A dwarven armor merchant, for example, would be unlikely to sell elven chain, while an elf would be just as unlikely to craft or sell a set of dwarven plate, each considering the other's craft to be the height of distaste. Similarly, some merchants may trend more towards selling heavy armor, medium armor, or shields, but all tend to have at least a few token offerings of goods outside their particular focus.

POTIONS, POISONS, AND HERBS

Grinding together her mortar and pestle, a halfling reduces a handful of herbs to powder. As her cauldron begins to boil, smoke pours out the smokestack of her underhill shop, a sign to her loyal customers that new potions are brewing.

Dressed in a grey cloak with a bandolier of potions about his waist, a half-elf occupies a corner at a roadside inn, fiddling with an alembic set up on a stone table. The townsfolk know to find him here, and direct adventurous travelers to seek his services.

Naturalists or alchemists, these merchants sell potions, poisons, and the supplies to brew them. The potions these merchants have rotate, and most in this trade only offer up to four potions or poisons per quality category. The potions these merchants create replenish after the merchant has had 30 days to craft new ones.

Merchants of this trade are likely to further specialize, as many are especially adept at brewing poisons, while others have ethical qualms about creating them.

RELIGIOUS IDOLS AND BLESSINGS

A tiefling with short horns and a modest robe lights a handful of incense in a ceremonial brazier. As she tends to her ritual duties in service to her god, she routinely checks on visiting parishioners, making sure their needs are met. The acolytes of her temple are more than happy to share what they have with pilgrims, asking only a modest donation in return.

Rapier slung at her side, a cheerful gnome paladin travels between distant cities, dispensing justice and doing good deeds all along the way. Always overjoyed to meet fellow travelers, she sells supplies sacred to her goddess of journeys, making sure no wanderer goes unprotected.

Almost always men and women of the cloth (or hucksters pretending at being such), these merchants bolster their respective faiths by dispensing holy wares to those in need. Most items listed here are sold by all merchants with this specialty and the appropriate quality, though merchants of different faiths offer markedly different-looking wares. For example, a candle sold by a priest of Pelor would look different in obvious ways from a candle sold by an (undoubtedly secret) adherent of Vecna.

Most merchants of this trade are able to cast spells for your benefit, with a donation in proportion to the magnitude of the spell cast. Spells the merchants are willing to cast are listed alongside the goods they sell, below. Any specific merchant is only able to cast 3 spells per day, regardless of their spell level.

SONGS AND INSTRUMENTS

Boxes of whittled wooden instruments at his feet, a brightly-clothed half-orc plays proudly on his bagpipes in the center of a crowded market. Though he knows his business isn't presently booming, he takes comfort that, at the very least, none in the market can possibly ignore him.

Sitting in a surprisingly cheerful store, a graceful drow carefully strings a lyre with treated spider silk. Though the silk no longer adheres forcefully to what it touches, it is no less durable, making it ideal for its purpose. The drow slowly plucks the lyre's new strings, filling her shop with a beautiful, mournful tune.

Whether they are bards or craftspersons, merchants of this specialty deal in musical instruments and written songs for musicians. Many of these merchants offer all wares available to their quality or lesser here, though some do specialize in selling one particular type of instrument along with their written songs, usually one of cultural significance to the merchant and their people.

SPELL TOMES AND SCROLLS

Seated adjacent to a near-perfect pyramid of stacked scrolls, a high elf dips his quill in ink and begins to write a new scroll in fluid elvish script. His shop utterly quiet save for the scratching of his pen on parchment, the florid script begins to glow ever so slightly in the dim afternoon light.

A male tiefling clad in a large coat and a dusty wizard's hat stands in a busy marketplace next to a pile of books nearly as tall as he is. The tiefling yells out attempting to attract buyers, but a closer inspection reveals many of the tomes to be chained shut, murmuring worryingly to each other.

Selling magical spells is not for the faint of heart, but merchants with this specialty make it a way of life. The tomes and scrolls sold by these merchants each contain a specific spell, and a merchant with this specialty rarely has more than one tome or scroll that casts the same spell. These merchants usually have all wares of their quality or lesser that are listed here, in one form or another.

Unlike most magic items, scrolls and ritual books sold by these merchants are eventually restocked after 30 days have passed. Scrolls may be used if the spell they hold is on your class spell list, and require a check if the spell is of a higher level than what you could normally cast. Complete rules for spell scrolls are found in the Dungeon Master's Guide on page 200.

Characters that are able to transcribe spells into a tome for ritual casting can copy spells out of spell scrolls and ritual books. Wizard characters may also copy into their spellbook non-ritual spells of a level that they can cast from spell scrolls. Regardless, copying a spell from a spell scroll requires a check detailed in the spell scroll's rules section, while copying a ritual spell from a ritual book requires no such check. Copying a spell from either source still requires an expenditure of time and wealth detailed in features that grant ritual casting, and copying a spell into a spellbook erases it from a ritual book or spell scroll.

THEIVING SUPPLIES

Standing grey as dusk against the dim light at the end of a back alley, a cloaked human awaits approaching buyers. She trusts her contacts on the street to bring those interested to her, and, so far, that trust has yet to fail her. Hearing a knocking in thieves' cant reverberate from the mouth of the alley, she knocks out the countersign, and unrolls her bundle of wares onto the ground.

A halfling with an eyepatch hums to himself as he sets up his wares on the walls of the inside of an open wine barrel in the back of a bar. Satisfied at the items' arrangement, he takes a seat nearby, pulling a hidden lever. Groaning, the wine barrel mechanically closes its front, appearing whole to the untrained eye. The halfling sips a cup of tea, and awaits customers.

Though their business may not (necessarily) be illegal, these merchants work tirelessly to enable criminals, spies, and assassins. Merchants with this specialty usually have at least four types of items from each applicable quality, and (most often) do not attempt to directly swindle customers unless the merchant is of atrocious quality. All merchants value repeat buyers, thieving supplies merchants being no exception, and any merchant knows the surest way to make enemies and lose business is to swindle those who will likely have even more coin for you to earn in the future.

TOOLS

Slouched over a wooden countertop, a lanky wood elf stands in front of rows upon rows of tools, each hanging from a special set of pegs on the wall behind him. The shop smells comfortably of fresh cut lumber. The wood elf yawns, waiting for customers to arrive.

A female dwarf, pack mule and wagon in tow, strides casually into town, a pickaxe and shovel over each shoulder, a lit lantern resting near the head of the pick. The laborers of this hamlet sent out a request for more tools a week back, and the dwarf responded, always ready to earn coin.

Craftspeople or mere traders, merchants of this specialty sell tools for all professions along their trade routes. Merchants that sell tools may choose to deal in exclusively tools appropriate for their environment. However, most of these merchants are fully willing to sell everything available to their quality or lower, providing working implements to any who require them.

VEHICLES AND TRANSPORTATION

Sitting at a table in a dimly-lit wagonhouse, a dwarf with a beard full of sawdust waits patiently for customers to trail in. The smells of horses, hay, and fresh-cut wood waft through his shop, full of carriages and carts, both humble and ornately gilded.

The crashing of waves and the squawking of gulls periodically interrupted by the percussive strikes of his hammer, a half-elf in an airy, billowing shirt pounds nails through planks, securing together the hull of a mighty ship. When completed, this vessel will be one of the fleetest to ever sail the seas, a fact the half-elf relentlessly informs any that will listen.

Craftsmen and women who specialize in transportation, these merchants churn out boats and wheeled vehicles to keep the world in motion. Many of these merchants also offer courier services and transportation for hire, and keep a small staff of hirelings to aid with these endeavors. Vehicle and transportation merchants are also very likely to further specialize, and may eschew selling wagons and horses entirely in favor of shipcraft, or dedicate themselves entirely to land transportation, especially if there are no large bodies of water nearby.

WEAPONS

An impossibly burly, scarred halfling presides over a remarkably odd shop. Weapon racks line the periphery, circling entirely around a large ring of honor carved into the center of the floor. The halfling proprietor encourages customers to test the products first-hand, sparring or squaring off against wooden training dummies.

Two long steel swords slung across her back, a red-scaled dragonborn boldly challenges all comers to combat in her corner of the marketplace. Exhibiting the prowess and power of her weapons, she earns both customers and a fan following through her practical demonstrations.

Fighters or forgemasters, merchants of this specialty sell weapons of great offensive power. Some of these merchants seek to profit from the necessities of war, while others are idealists, promoting peace through protection. Still others are retired adventurers, knowing the hardships and threats that exist in the wider world all too well, and providing reliable protection against the dangers other adventurers may encounter. Many weapon merchants sell all inventory that would be available to their quality or lower, but some further specialize, focusing on a particular type of weaponry such as bows or axes.

LEGENDARY MERCHANTS

The following merchants are only available by rolling them on the Legendary Merchants table. Any Stronghold ability that would allow you to select a merchant may not be used to select a legendary merchant.

ASTRAL TRAVELER

An old magus with a trailing grey beard sits at a crossroads, smoke curling from a long-stemmed pipe. He watches passers-by with eyes bluer than blue, sparkling with a deep, inner magic. Those that look closely with the right kind of sight can see subtle tears in reality around him, a distortion of light and being marking him as here, yet not. When held to any kind of scrutiny, the magus ignores it and blows a perfect cube of pipe-smoke.

An astral traveler has seen more than most beings will in several lifetimes. They have tasted pains and delights belonging to realities far removed from the Prime Material, and have set foot where both celestials and fiends fear to find themselves. Naturally, an astral traveler has come across plenty of souvenirs in their journeying, and are willing to part with a few of them for the right amount of coin.

ENCHANTMENTS

Clothed in a cowl and long, flowing robes, a female human focuses her will, bending innate magic around her and focusing it into a single, cohesive thought-form. Glowing placidly, the thought-form floats before her, ready to be bound into a weapon, empowering it permanently with a figment of her magical will. As she works, a cluster of astounded village children and skeptical elders crowd around her roadside stall, but the human is either deep in thought or pretending not to notice.

A scruffy male gnome, beard and hair frizzed out in every direction, attends with his set of tinker's tools to a battle axe laid out before him. His immense scientific mind calculates the energy flow intrinsic to the powerful weapon, and devises the particular method required for generating a self-sustaining magical current within it. Wiring up the axe to an etheric battery of his own design, the gnome activates it, and the axe begins to hum with a distinctly magical vibration.

Legendary merchants that deal in enchantments are by definition a rarity, but a welcome sight in any town they visit. Enchantments these merchants apply may be bound to any non-magical or magical item, and a non-magical item affected by an enchantment becomes magical and requires attunement. An item can have a maximum of one enchantment from each of the three categories, and no more than three enchantments total at any time. Applying a new enchantment in the same category overrides the previous enchantment.

FEY BARGAINS

Sitting on a worn stump in a clear grove, a faun with large, pronounced, pronged horns plays an ephemeral tune on a hollow wooden pipe. In this place, sacred to the fey, the faun waits for the occasional adventurous wanderer, hunter, or forager delving too deep into the woods. The faun has wares he would trade, and many simple favors he would ask.

Wearing a cloak of leaves that sweeps the ground as she walks, a female eladrin has a motley collection of wares spread wide across her wooden tabletop at a local market. She smiles at all who approach, and is quick to inform those who visit of her no-currency policy. It is only when her customers are deep into negotiations that her eyes sparkle with a hidden malice, and those bartering may begin to suspect she is more than she seems.

Holding little interest in coin, the fey prefer to trade in favors, sealed by a geas spell, to compell their customers to act in certain ways. As such, fey bargains have no currency cost, but have an associated price in geases, rolled randomly on the Geas tables below. If a geas would not apply for whatever reason, reroll until you receive a geas that does. These geases must be known by the customer before they are agreed upon and, though the fey may not lie, they may attempt to egregiously mislead those with which they deal. Fey merchants will only typically trade one item per person for geases, considering overburdening their customers with geases to be impractical.

MAGIC ITEMS

Stroking the end of his long, white, curled beard, a gnome wearing a pointy hat sits at the open back end of his caravan wagon. Painted above him is a rough wooden sign advertising his wagon-based shop, and the noise of magical shimmering from errant enchantments cascades gently through the wagon behind him.

Placing a gentle hand upon a silver ring, a high elf concentrates her magical energies on the runed circle in which the ring resides. Using her other hand to sprinkle residuum around the edges, the circle suddenly ignites in a bright flash of arcane power, leaving her shop smelling faintly of ozone. Removing her hand, she smiles as she observes the ring, now shimmering and pulsing with a subtle eldritch resonance.

A rarity in many worlds, merchants with this specialty are often highly sought after. Magic items are always hard to make, and a merchant selling magical items may not carry the full list of items displayed here, occasionally having on-hand five or six items from each quality that is available to them.

MAGICAL CREATURES

A jovial male human, old and wizened, wears a roped turban and pipes a jaunty tune in the far corner of an open marketplace. Before him dances a lithe, golden flying serpent, which twists and coils in response to the man's music.

Sitting at the open end of her wagon, a female copper-scaled dragonborn watches the crowds pass her by. She waits patiently, attempting not to attract too much or too little notice, as her cargo of vibrantly-glimmering dragon eggs shimmers gently in the covered wagon's soft light.

Magical beasts are, by their nature, hard to control or tame, and only a select few individuals have the ability to coax such creatures into following and listening to them. Of these, fewer still have the predilection to sell such creatures, but merchants of magical creatures are highly sought-after wherever they may find themselves. These merchants usually don't have the full inventory listed here, and most often only have up to three creatures available per quality category.

Sold creatures are usually tame, but may not be, if marked otherwise. Untamed magical creatures may require Animal Handling checks to interact with them favorably, usually with a DC of 15 or 20 depending on the task demanded of them. These creatures may become tamed over time, at your DM's discretion.

NECROMANCY

Seated atop a large burial mound, a young male human wears a skeletal mask with his hair tied back. Every night finds him here, waiting for either the call of the spirits, or for interested customers to seek his wares.

After slumbering in near-death for centuries, a lich awoke to find a city had been built on top of his ancient dungeon. Rather than vow revenge against the living, however, the lich was of a more practical mind, building his dungeon into a shop for all comers, to finance the dread experiments that are no doubt taking place below.

The relationship between necromancers and wider society is often troubled, at best, but that doesn't stop an enterprising few from building a niche market among the grave-minded. Both the dead and the living have needs, after all, and the exchange of coin facilitates everyone's needs being met. Depending on location and the area's dominant moral set, the exchange of necromantic goods and services may be illegal, merely frowned upon, or a normal and accepted part of everyday life.

NEEDFUL THINGS

A handsome young high elf stands amongst his wares in a brand-new stall, recently opened within the marketplace. Though new to town, he has already acquired a reputation for outlandish deals, coupled with strange requests, and only the most perceptive among the locals have noticed a hint of brimstone to the incense that burns within his shop.

Seated on a stool at a crossroads, an impeccably dressed gentleman holds a wooden case in his lap. Surprisingly, its contents always seem to be exactly what his customers desire, and he's more than willing to part with it for a fair price, and the smallest of favors.

The fiends of Hell are no strangers to business, and occasionally take part in the financial dealings of the mortal world to spread discord and their own influence. Money, however, is not an object to these disguised merchants from down below, and they will gladly offer a discount if the purchaser agrees to perform a favor or two that will further the many agendas of Hell.

If a player is willing to undertake favors for this merchant, roll for random favors on the Inconsequential Favors tables, below. This merchant automatically knows when favors have been completed, and will reduce the price of one item the player desires by half. An item available to a medium quality merchant requires only one favor to achieve this discount, while items in the good merchant quality category require two favors, and excellent merchant items require three favors. The merchants of Hell will also only discount one item per buyer per day, preferring to string along prospective buyers into long campaigns of imperceptibly evil actions.

TIME-LOST

Wandering a long, winding road, an armored human male with a tiny dragonling upon his shoulder clutches a small, colored rectangle of strange material, staring at it intently. Briefly he holds it aloft, waves it slowly around, and then shakes it violently before sighing and placing it in a pouch at his side. As he opens the pouch, a careful onlooker could spot a wealth of similar strange creations and contraptions, before the human quickly and carefully ties his pouch shut.

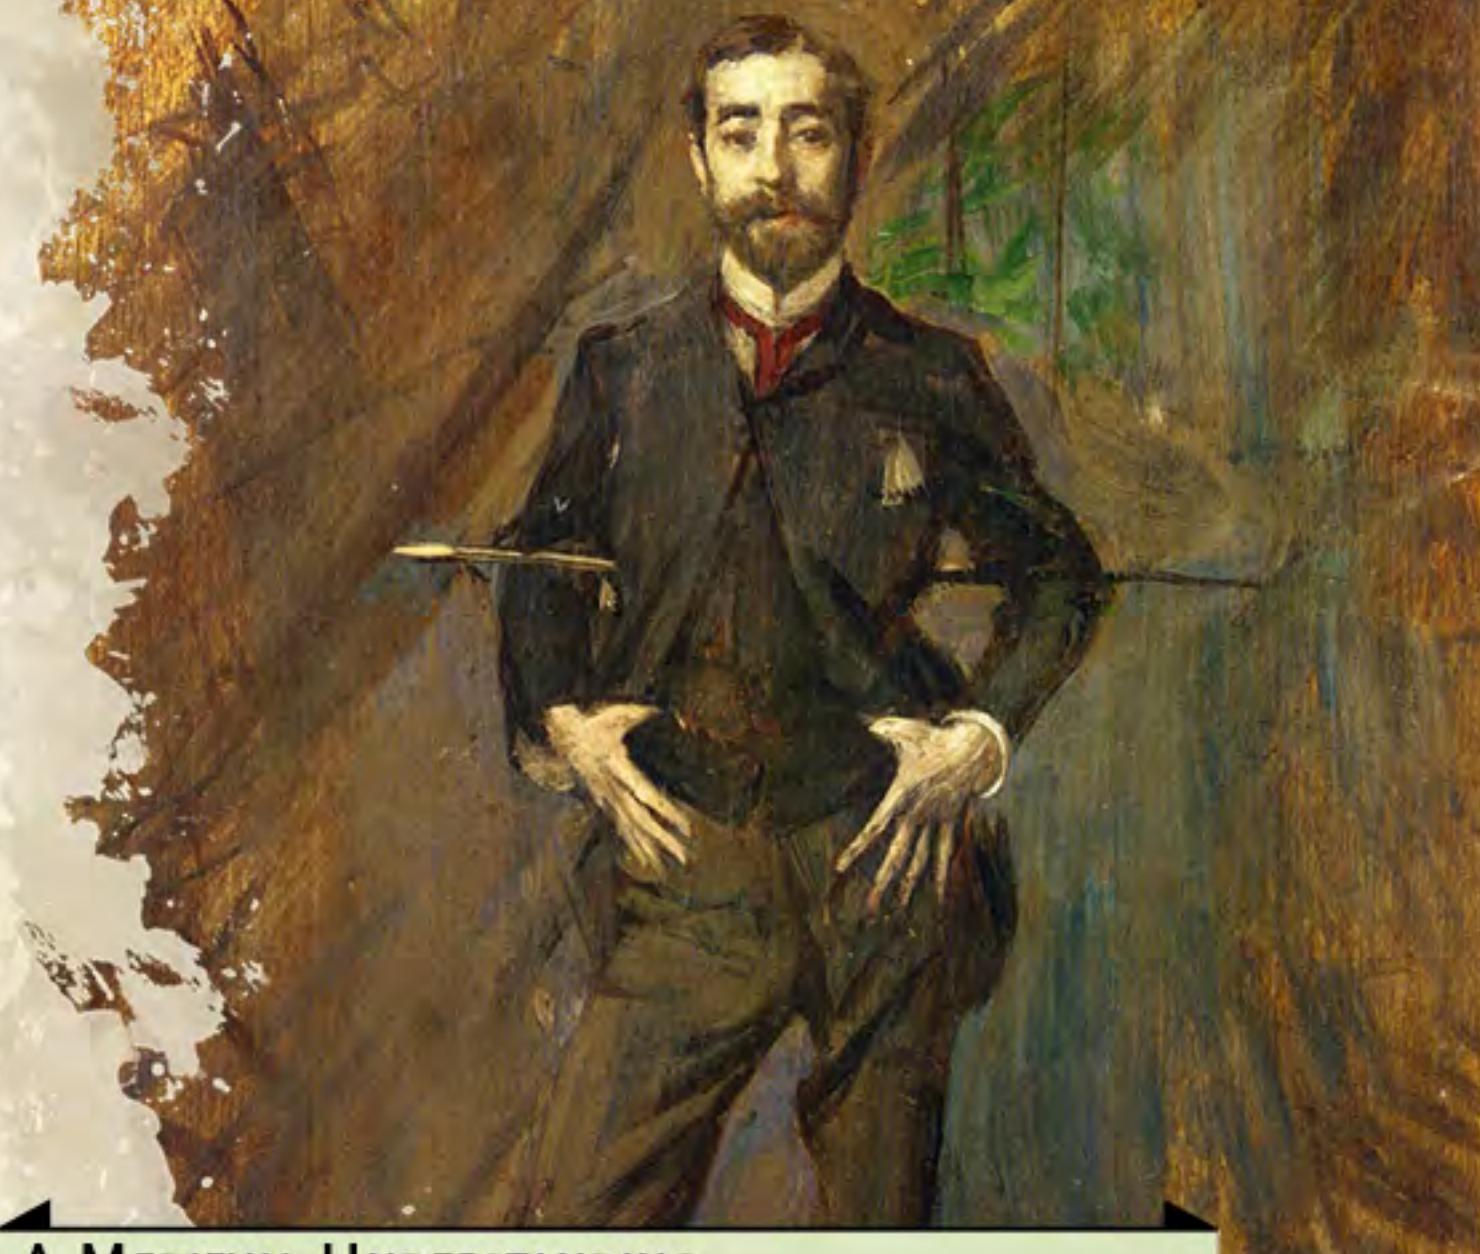

Set up adjacent to an inn, a man with tossed hair and a surprisingly vivid bow-tie has a collection of odd wares spread across a ramshackle wooden table that appears inexpertly cobbled together. Behind the man lies, on its side, an oblong and smoldering blue box, into which he reaches periodically to retrieve new goods, appraising each in turn before shrugging and placing them upon his slapshod table.

As some arcanists and scholars of the immaterial know, planar travel is not the only method for exploring the multiverse. Through either a quirk of reality or their own design, few denizens of a future time may stumble into the past. These individuals almost always have returning to their native time as their driving goal, and may be willing to trade away some of their foreign resources to gain the currency they need to achieve this end.

Electric Torch. When activated, casts bright light in a 120-foot cone, and dim light 120 feet after that. Comes with an energy cell, and can run for 12 hours continuously before requiring the cell replaced to function.

Entertainment Pad. This small, smooth rectangle has a panel that lights up and responds to touch. When activated, it can play one of 5d10 outlandish songs and contains 1d10 different types of games or distractions. Comes with an energy cell, and can run for 6 hours continuously before requiring the cell replaced to function.

Jetpack. When activated as a bonus action, you fly a

A MEDIEVAL UNDERSTANDING

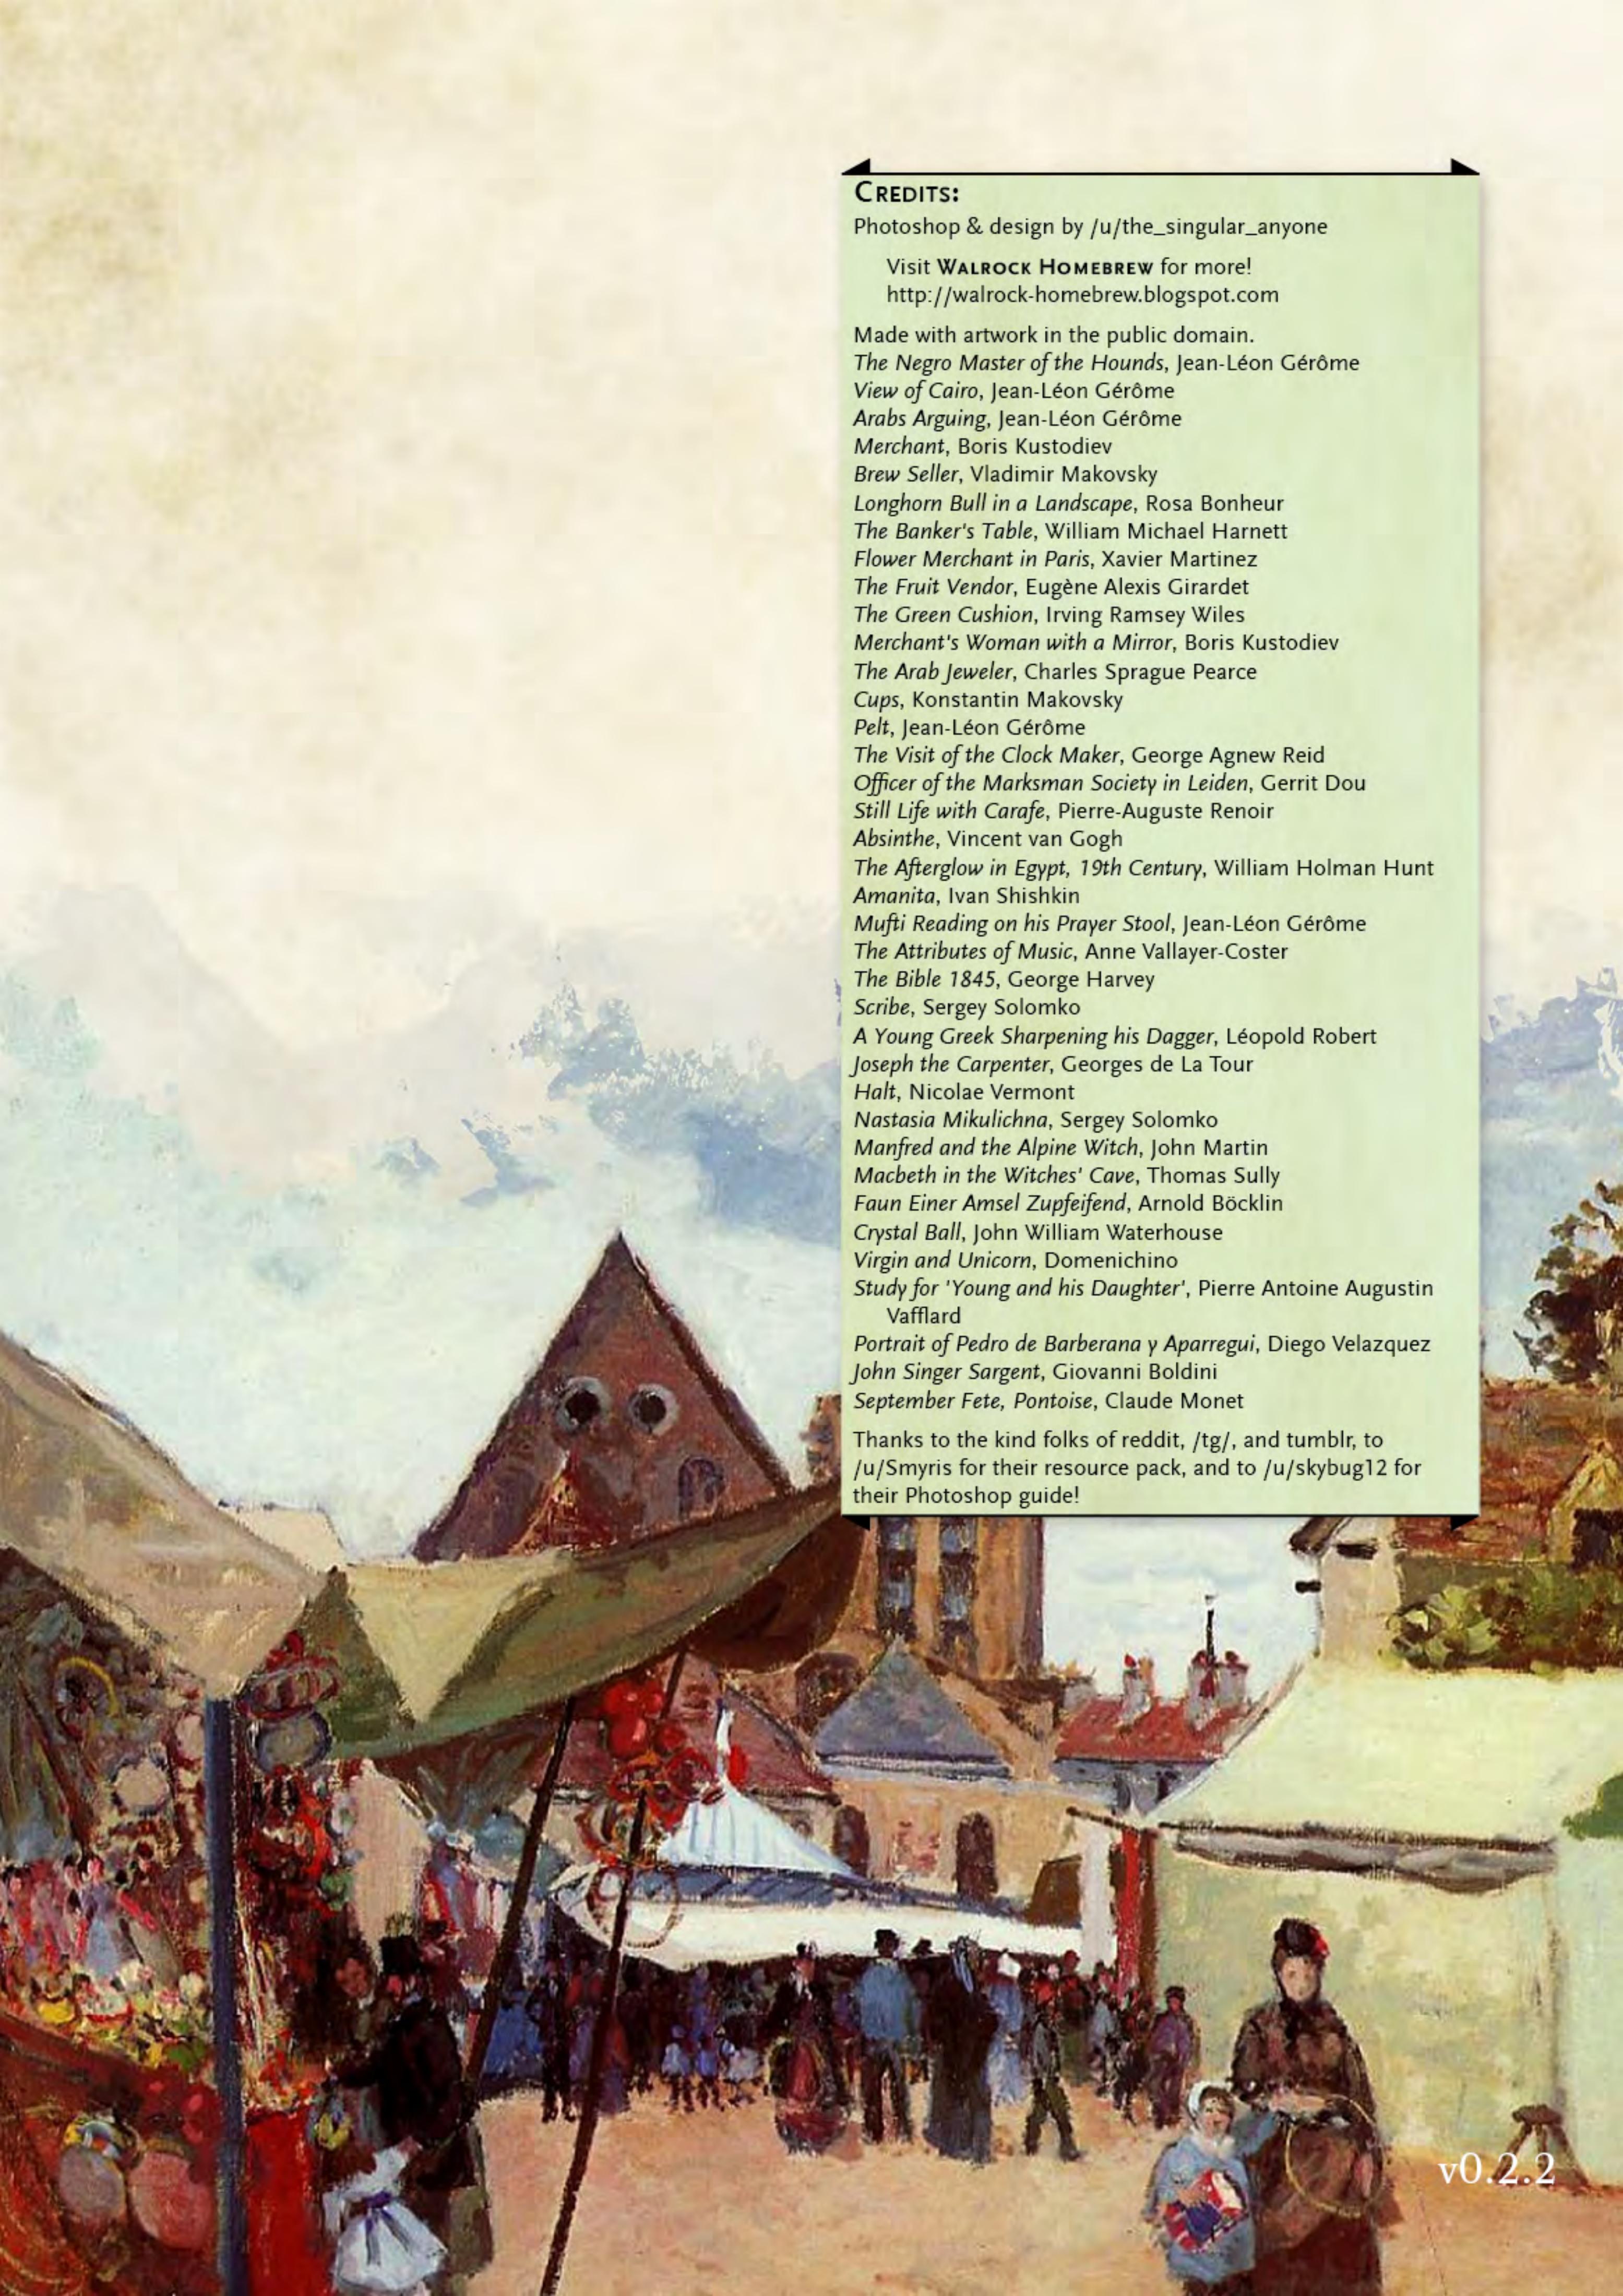

While undoubtedly players will grasp the general idea behind the items listed here, their characters are a different story. It's thus highly recommended that you use the Figuring Out Alien Technology table and associated rules on page 268 of the Dungeon Master's Guide to illustrate this disconnect for any item labeled as "tech." The number rating associated with tech represents the successes needed to figure out an item, and more difficult technology requires more successes.

Understanding how an item works is the first step to gaining proficiency with it. To acquire proficiency, you must train with the item for 250 days, spending 1 gp on training costs per day. Refer to the Training downtime activity on page 187 of the Player's Handbook for any further specifics.

distance equal to $2d10 \times 5$ feet in a direction you choose. Unless you have a fly speed or this item is activated again immediately, you will begin to fall at the start of your next turn. Comes with an energy cell, and can be used 10 times before requiring the cell replaced to function.
